Paper-Trader launches US exchanges and CFDs

The problem of how to practice investing just got a whole lot easier

It's the classic stock market dilemma. How to learn and practice without risking your hard earned cash. All too often the learning happens with real money and that puts unnecessary strain on the emotions of the investor.

"People need to learn and practice emotion free to start with so that they have a solid understanding of the strategy, including the risks, BEFORE they put real money in the market. It's ironic that people spend so much time practicing their footy or golf, and virtually none practicing their investing."

I was fortunate enough to spend some time with Nik Halik recently and asked him about paper trading, or backtesting as he calls it. Nik backtests all the time, to get better at what he does. He uses it to understand why things didn't go as expected and to continually refine and improve his systems. If someone like Nik still practices, don't you think you should too?

Paper-Trader's impending release of US Stock Exchanges and CFDs takes learning in safety to a new level. Now not only can you practice individual stock, option or CFD trades, but also combination and complex trades. And on any of the four exchanges ASX, NYSE, NASDAQ or AMEX.

You can think of Paper-Trader as a Flight Simulator for the stock market. It behaves just like the real stock market. It uses real stocks, real prices, you place trades just like in the real world and make or lose money just like in the real world. But it doesn't risk real cash.

The other thing about the stock market is that nothing is static. It's like an evolving ecosystem and smart people continue studying this ecosystem to make sure the systems they use are still relevant.

"I see people ploughing their money into the market all the time without really knowing what they're doing, and it scares the hell out of me."

So put as much energy into practicing your investing as you do your sport and your chances of being successful for years to come improves dramatically.
